A GAMBLER'S STAKE.

The Marquis Angelo Foscarini had been travelling throughout Europe for several years, sanitary measures inducing him to visit Paris. To the gay metropolis he was accompanied by his daughter, the beautiful Olympia, she being the only issue of three most unhappy marriages.

The disappointment of Foscarini's life had been in not having had an heir. He would have given his fortune, almost his life, for a son, one who could perpetuate the noble name of Foscarini. His life was passed in orgies and every sort of dissipation. He loved Olympia, not as a father should have loved his daughter, but rather because she was beautiful, and one of the most precious of his possessions. He kept her always with him, and had refused her hand in marriage to some of the most distinguished noblemen in Austria and Italy.

"Remain with me," he would say, "you will have plenty of time to marry when I am dead." After a night of excitement and dissipation it was his habit to take a bath in the Seine, in order to revive his exhausted energies.

One day while bathing he was seized with cramp, and had not some one rushed to his rescue he would have been drowned. In his preserver he recognized an officer of the Tribunal, one whom he had met first at Piedmont, and afterward at Vienna; whose assiduity to Olympia had given him some uneasiness.

The young officer on discovering that the man whose life he had saved was no other than the Marquis Foscarini, at once requested permission to call upon himself and daughter. To this request the Marquis most cordially acquiesced, it being impossible under the circumstances to venture a refusal.

Stephen LeRoy at once embraced that advantage afforded by the position, and within a month after the accident the Marquis and Le Roy were inseparable.

Le Roy was deeply in love with Olympia, but now wisely and cautiously repressed any manifestation of his feelings—moreover, had expressed himself to the Marquis as being entirely cured of his very extravagant passion.

He addressed Olympia without any apparent trembling or embarrassment, paying her only the ordinary compliments permitted by society. The Marquis feeling entirely reassured, and having perfect confidence, made Le Roy his friend and confidant. While the old nobleman was misled, the young people, nevertheless, understood each other, and in all respects Olympia assisted her lover in his scheme. Thus Le Roy was enabled to pass every evening at the hotel of the Marquis, and in order to humor the nobleman, became a devoted gambler. In one month he had lost two months' salary and all he could borrow.

Olympia had advised him to play in order to ingratiate him with her father. She lent him gold, which he lost, and the more he lost the more fond the old Marquis became, for he knew of no emotion save in play, no happiness except that which was derived from gain. At length the luck turned in favor of Le Roy—night after night he won. The Marquis was devoted to bouillotte; this game he had taught Stephen, who, although indifferent to its merits, nevertheless expressed admiration for the same.

One evening Le Roy came half an hour earlier to the hotel than was his custom. On the occasion he brought with him the sum of fifty louis. It was the only money Olympia had in her possession. Le Roy was without means, and was obliged to submit to circumstances, as a failure to play would have called forth the ill will of the Marquis and deprive them of meeting.

"This is all that remains," said Olympia, sadly. "Should I lose this life of deception must end," responded Le Roy. "I will then go to the Marquis and request your hand in marriage."

"And if refused," replied the young girl. "Then I will blow out my brains," was the quiet rejoinder.

Olympia shuddered at the words, for she well knew that Le Roy would keep his vow faithfully.

and then promised to meet again in a few hours.

At the solicitation of Olympia, Le Roy postponed speaking to her father, whose loss had been very great.

The meeting of the party again took place as arranged, and Foscarini lost all he possessed in the world—his palaces in Florence and Naples, his villas at the foot of Vesuvius and in the neighborhood of Rome; there remained not a vestige of his large fortune. He was ruined.

Through the closed shutters and crimson curtains the day was piercing, and made the dying candles look still more pale. Of these six gamblers four resembled statues. The immense losses of their host amazed them, although accustomed as they were to loss as a result of gaming.

Two men alone among them seemed to retain their self-possession, and they were Le Roy and Foscarini. The latter was searching his pockets in vain hope of finding something to stake, but not even his watch remained. His countenance was terrible to behold.

"Gentlemen," he at length said, "all I once had is now yours, and you can with authority bid me quit this house, which is no longer mine."

"Marquis!" exclaimed Le Roy. "Nay, listen to me," continued Foscarini; addressing Le Roy.

"You once loved my daughter, and I refused her hand," "You did."

"Do you love her still?" "Yes, fervently."

"Again, I repeat, are you sure that you love her as you once professed?" "I do."

"What say you, then, to play for her?" "At these terrible words all the gamblers arose, but were incapable of speaking, so great was their excitement. In gesture they implored Le Roy to refuse.

"Did you hear me?" continued Foscarini. "Will you play for the possession of my daughter?"

"Will you not accept me as your son-in-law, Monsieur le Marquis? If so, I beg to restore to you all that chance has given, and that you have lost through me."

"I refuse most positively," responded the Marquis.

"Then I accept your proposition," replied Le Roy coldly; "now listen to mine."

All present expressed horror at such an arrangement. Foscarini returned their gaze with one of sovereign contempt and indifference. Then turning to Le Roy he said, "Be it as you wish."

"I play for your daughter," replied the young officer, "against all I possess in the world, my name, my person and my honor."

"It is well," responded the Marquis, as he speedily threw three cards upon the table. They were three aces. Le Roy also threw three cards; they were three tens; he drew a fourth card, it was also a ten. He had gained.

All arose, desiring to depart. As they saluted the Marquis they saw that he was weeping. The loss of his child and his millions had reduced him to a state of wretchedness beyond even the misery of mendacity.

Le Roy approached the Marquis. For an instant he paused.
